LEADING IN THE 21st CENTURY

The Six Deadly Sins of Leadership
There is much to be learned from exploring what leaders commonly get wrong, for it is in their failures that leaders often have the most impact, both on individuals and organizations.

Thus, we ask you to consider the following material with a critical eye. Do any sins apply to your own behaviors? If so, such new self-awareness is the first step to corrective action.

And for those of you who are not yet leaders, again, careful scrutiny is advised. Understanding where your own leaders, now or at any earlier point in your career, might have gone awry is an insight that could serve you well in the future. Because this information is built on the belief that being a leader is perhaps the hardest challenge any of us will ever face. No matter how long we work at it, practicing the right behavior is a never-ending task. Knowing — and avoiding — the wrong behavior is a never-ending task, too. Thus, we offer the following:

Leadership Sin #1: Not Giving Self-confidence its Due

Self-confidence is the lifeblood of success. People with self-confidence try new things, offer ideas, exude positive energy, and cooperate with their colleagues instead of surreptitiously attempting to bring them down. When they lack self-confidence, it's just the opposite. They spread negativity with every word and gesture.

But all too often leaders ignore (or neglect) this very basic fact of the human condition. Why is anyone's guess. Perhaps they just don't understand that it is part of their job to instill self-confidence in their people. It may even be said that it is their first job. You cannot unleash the creative power of individuals who doubt themselves.

Fortunately, some people seem to be born with self-confidence. Others gain it from life and work experience and come to a company fully loaded. Regardless, leaders can never stop pouring self-confidence into their teams. The ways to do so are myriad. Make sure goals are challenging — but achievable. Give effusive positive feedback. Remind your direct reports of what they do right.

We're not saying that leaders should blindly extol and exalt. People know when they're being gamed. But good leaders work relentlessly to find ways to instill self-confidence in those around them. They know it's the gift that never stops giving.

Leadership Sin #2: Muzzling Voice

Perhaps the most frustrating way that leaders underperform is by over-talking. That is, they act like know-it-alls. They can tell you how the world works, what corporate is thinking, how it will backfire if you try this or that, and why you can't possibly change the product one iota.

Sometimes such blowhards get their swagger from a few positive experiences, but usually they're just victims of their own destructive personalities. Ultimately, the company ends up being a victim too, because know-it-alls aren't just insufferable, they're dangerous. They don't listen, and that deafness makes it very hard for new ideas to get debated, expanded upon, or improved. No single person, no matter how smart, can take a business to its apex. For that, you need every voice to be heard.

In the 1980s, Jack Welch had an experience that was to change his way of leading forever. As CEO of GE, he had decided to launch an initiative called "Work Out," where every employee of the company was given the opportunity to speak his or her mind about how things were done. The output was shocking. Terrific new ideas, long buried in the bureaucracy or under the weight of know-it-all bosses, were set free, leading to an explosion in productivity and employee buy-in.

After one such session, a middle-aged appliance worker approached Jack. "For 25 years, you paid for my hands," he said. "You could have had my brain too — for free."

As a result of that comment, Jack Welch redoubled his commitment to Work-Out as a way of life within GE, essentially guaranteeing that all voices could and would be heard. He realized, as you should too, that know-it-all leadership creates a deadly silence.

Leadership Sin #3: Acting Phony
Can you spot a phony? Of course you can — and so can your people. Indeed, if there is one widespread human capability, it is sniffing out someone who is putting on airs, pretending to be who they are not, or just keeping their real self hidden. Yet too many leaders spend way too much time creating personas that put a wall between them and their employees. What a waste.

Because authenticity is what makes people love you. Visibly grappling with tough problems, sweating the details, laughing, and caring — those are the activities that make people respond and feel engaged with what you're saying. Sure, some people will tell you that being mysterious grants you power as a leader. In reality, all it generates is fear. And who wants to motivate that way?

Now, obviously, authenticity is unattractive if it's coupled with immaturity or an overdose of informality. And organizations generally don't like people who are too emotionally unbounded — i.e. so real that all their feelings are exposed. They tend to tamp that kind of intensity down a bit. And that's not a bad thing, as work is work and, more than at home, allows us to maintain some privacy.

But don't let convention wring all the authenticity out of you, especially as you climb the ladder. In time, humanity always wins. Your team and bosses come to know who you are in your soul, what kind of people you attract and what kind of performance you want from everyone. Your realness will make you accessible; you will connect and you will inspire. You will lead.

Leadership Sin #4: Lacking the Guts to Differentiate
You only have to be in business a few weeks to know that not all investment opportunities are created equal. But some leaders can't face that reality, and so they sprinkle their resources like cheese on a pizza, a little bit everywhere. As a result, promising growth opportunities too often don't get the outsized infusions of cash and people they need. If they did, someone might get offended during the resource allocation process.

Someone — as in the manager of a weak business or the sponsor of a dubious investment proposal.

But leaders who don't differentiate do the most damage when it comes to people. Unwilling to deliver candid, rigorous performance reviews, they give every employee the same kind of bland, mushy, "nice job" sign-off. Then, when rewards are doled out, they give star performers little more than the laggards. Now, you can call this egalitarian approach kind, or fair — as these lousy leaders usually do — but it's really just weakness. And when it comes to building a thriving organization where people have the chance to grow and succeed, weakness just doesn't cut it.

Leadership Sin #5: Fixation on Results at the Expense of Values
We've already made the point in this curriculum (and more than once, if you're counting!) that leaders deliver. Oratory and inspiration without results equal... well, a whole lot of nothing.

But leaders are committing a real dereliction of duties if all they care about are the numbers. They also have to care about how those numbers came to be. Were the right behaviors practiced? Was the company's culture of integrity honored? Were people taken care of properly? Was the law obeyed, in both letter and spirit?

Values are a funny thing in business. Companies love to talk about them. They love to hang them up on plaques in the lobby and boast about them to potential hires and customers. But they're meaningless if leaders don't live and breathe them. Sometimes that can take courage. It can mean letting go of a top performer who's a brute to his colleagues, or not promoting a star who doesn't share her best ideas with the team. That's hard.
And yet if you're a leader, this is a sin you cannot squint away. When you nail your results, make sure you can also report back to a crowded room: We did this the right way, according to our values.

Leadership Sin #6: Skipping the Fun Part

What is it about celebrating that makes managers so nervous? Maybe throwing a party doesn't seem professional, or it makes people worry that they won't look serious to the powers that be, or that, if things get too happy in the office, people will stop working their tails off.

Whatever the reason, too many leaders don't celebrate enough. To be clear here, we do not define celebrating as conducting one of those stilted little company-orchestrated events that everyone hates, in which the whole team is marched out to a local restaurant for an evening of forced merriment when they'd rather be home. We're talking about sending a team to Disney World with their families, or giving each team member tickets to a show or a movie, or handing each member of the team a new iPod.

What a lost opportunity. Celebrating makes people feel like winners and creates an atmosphere of recognition and positive energy. Imagine a team winning the World Series without champagne spraying everywhere. You can't! And yet companies win all the time and let it go without so much as a high-five.

Work is too much a part of life not to recognize the moments of achievement. Grab as many as you can. Make a big deal out of them. That's part of the leader's job, too — the fun part.
